White House Tackles Infrastructure Funding for Next Stimulus Package.

“Adding infrastructure funding to the crisis recovery will go a long way to providing jobs as well as ensuring transportation capabilities and resiliency for all modes of mobility, including the critical Goods Movement. We urge our federal legislators to make this happen.”

— Fran Inman, Commissioner, California Transportation Commission

A massive infrastructure investment could be a component of the next round of federal economic stimulus measures. After Congress cleared a nearly $500 billion small-business assistance bill, the White House intends to pursue funding for infrastructure projects in its fourth coronavirus relief package.

President Donald Trump is calling for a $2 trillion infrastructure package as part of the government’s emergency response to the pandemic. He has insisted the package would be funded through long-term borrowing at 0% interest, and his administration has signaled that proceeding with big-scale transportation projects would help provide long-term employment opportunities and facilitate an economic recovery across parts of the country.
